

Kyiv and Moscow: two opposite poles of civilization

Today, people all over the world are looking for an answer to the question "Why did Russia attack Ukraine and wage such a brutal war to destroy the whole country?" In this article I give an answer based on the historical, social and cultural branches of the development of the Russian people.

More than 400 years Moscow is at war with Ukraine for its colonisation. What was the difference between these two nations in those days and what is the situation now?

The city of Kyiv is the only capital in the world in which a continuous change of archaeological cultures for 20 thousand years has been found. Artefacts with a history of thousands of years are found all over Ukraine. At the same time in modern Russia, archaeologists cannot find anything ancient. Moreover, archaeological research shows that in the territory of Muscovy the change of the Stone Age to the Bronze Age took place 2,000 years later than in the lands of modern European countries.

New historical discoveries first of all performed by Ukrainian archaeologist and historian Dr. Yuri Shilov (Ancient History of Aratta-Ukraine (20,000 BCE – 1,000 CE), Amazon, 2015 <https://www.amazon.com/Ancient-History-Aratta-Ukraine-000-BCE/dp/1505241626>) over the past 30-20 years have shown that the first European civilisation, which started circa 8,000 years ago, represented the culture of communal primary Aratta – the territory between the Danube and Dnipro rivers. Aratta known as the Trypillian archaeological culture was a developed country of pre-slavery, pre-feudal, pre-capitalist and pre-totalitarian state structure. The culture of those times is still partly preserved in folk traditions. That culture gave the origin of Sumer, Greek and many other ancient cultures. In south part of Ukraine near the city of Melitopol is located the Stone Grave, which is the natural remains of a volcanic geyser that burned out 15 million years ago. The caves of the Stone Grave preserve paintings and the first inscriptions dated back 12,000 years, which were partially deciphered by linguist Dr. A. Kifishin.

The Stone Grave (before the war unleashed by the Muscovites).

The Arattan commune culture rested on a figurative-intuitive perception of the world, which subconsciously brought culture to an information field (i.e. the all-powerful, all-seeing god of the Slavic, Indian and Iranian Vedas). Aratta's people followed natural civilised behaviour in 'autopilot' mode. The community's efforts strived for connection to this 'autopilot', learning the natural harmonic behaviour of space. The laws of space automatically lead a person through life. An important, but lost, part of the ancient Aratta society was the practice of cultivating field sensitivity or, as we would say today, extrasensory sensitivity. The whole community was a harmonic ensemble (one can watch documentary in the web, which shows a general picture of the synchronization phenomenon, 'The Surprising Secret of Synchronization' <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=t-VPRCtiUg&t=0s>). Everyone knew what to do and what not to do in any case, since deviation from the rules of harmony led to disharmony for the individual and for society as a whole. In the Arattan society everything was subordinated to this pervasive field, they felt the field and tried to perform their actions in harmony with it. That was a deep scientific knowledge based on their figurative and intuitive perception of the environment. The culture of Aratta remained practically unchanged and people lived without wars, quarrels and conflicts for over 3,000 years!! Is not that a reason to learn and follow?

Ancient essential Arattan customs existed in Rus-Ukraine until the early 20th century, namely the democratic system of government, the Cossack Republics, which clearly flourished in Ukraine in the 15-18 centuries and partially lasted until 1922: an independence of the legislative, executive and judicial authorities, the election of all positions in direct elections with the prescribed procedure for recalling (election of the prime minister, managers of the Cossack elders, local governments, judges, senior police officers), and in addition the requirement of social assistance to poor people. The Cossack Code of Liberties, or Democratic Laws written in Latin by Ukrainian Hetman Pylyp Orlyk was brought to Western Europe in 1710.

By that year, Asian and European civilisations were characterised by secondary cultures, such as slavery, feudalism and totalitarianism. The appropriate culture is based on a logical-analytical world outlook, which through the means of rationalism leads culture towards material manifestations of the real world. Such a culture is changing over to 'manual control', which substitutes the natural culture of 'autopilot'.

However, from the 15th century the situation in Europe began to change dramatically. The completion of slave and feudal eras initiated the Italian Renaissance, continued through the German Reformation, raised the French Enlightenment and strengthened the Anglo-American scientific and technological revolution. Europe was moving towards the formation of capitalism, and at the same time in Ukraine there was a fully developed democratic system with full self-government.

In 1719, the Swedes were the first to decide to take the Cossack Code of Liberties, i.e. Philip Orlyk's Constitution as their basic law. Ukrainian Cossack colonel Tadeusz Kosciuszko (known as the national hero of Poland) was perhaps the most important commander in George Washington's liberation army, who brought the ideas of democracy to America. As a result, in 1788 the Ukrainian constitution was adopted by the United States, two years later it was approved by France, and so on. Those actions strongly democratised America and Europe.

Simultaneously, Ukraine itself, being in a state of continuous resistance to the aggressive aspirations of Poland, the Turkish Empire, and Muscovy, was eventually conquered by the Muscovites in the end of 17th century.

From the time of Peter I (reign 1682–1725), Muscovites began to put pressure on the Ukrainians, gradually appropriating the entire Rus-Ukrainian history, which was completed under Catherine II (reign 1762–1796). Namely, the Muscovites decided to brought themselves out of the ancient Rus, who supposedly after the Tatar-Mongol invasion in the 13th century moved in their majority to the modern European territory of Russia. Until 1721, the Muscovites called themselves the Moscow kingdom. Their own names were Muscovites, (also Moscaly, Moscovityane, Moskvichi); the name of their country was Muscovy.

So, who are they, Muscovites? These are the Finno-Ugric tribes that left the south of modern Malaysia circa 10,000 years ago and slowly occupied the north of Asia and also migrated to Europe. Finns and Estonians are extreme western peoples who early separated from the general group. Hungary is also largely a group of Finno-Ugric tribes. There are memories of European travellers of the 16th century, who noted that the language in the Muscovite kingdom is very similar to the language of the inhabitants of Hungary.

The names of Finno-Ugric tribes living in modern Russia are: Mordva-Moksha, Mordva-Erzya, Meshchera, Merya, Veps, Mari, Mari-el, Chukhnya, Ostyaks, Uighurs, Muroma, Whole, Tiva, Chud, Perm, Yam, Sucked, Komi, Samoedy (self-eating), Tungus, Lopari and so on. These people do not learn their native languages, they can speak only Muscovite (more known today as Russian).

In V BCE Herodotus in his Histories noted the following. In the north, beyond the Dnipro river, in 11 days of sailing across the desert [wild forests], Androphages lived who were a special tribe (they seem were ancestors of the modern Muscovites). Among all the tribes, the Androphages had the wildest customs. They knew neither courts nor laws and were nomads. They wore clothes similar to the Scythian, but they had a particular language. That was the only tribe of cannibals in that country.

It seems at least some of the Finno-Ugric tribes should be associated with those ancient Androphages. Note that almost all European languages from old times have included the same word, which means to kill and murder: мордувати [morduvaty] (Ukrainian), moderstwo (Polish), Mord (German), mörda (Swedish), mord (Norwegian), murder (English), meurtre (French), etc. Apparently these words are related to the name of the Mordovian tribe, i.e. Mordva.

If Western Europe moved from feudalism to capitalism and then to democracy, and Ukraine was almost democratic, neighbouring Muscovy all the time remained totalitarian, in which slavery reigned. Let us read what Austrian Baron Sigismund von Herberstein-Neipperg-Güttentag, who lived among Muscovites for a long time as ambassador and studied local customs, told about them in his 'Notes on Muscovite Affairs' (1549):

“The whole nation of Muscovites is in the worst of slavery. All together and everyone, regardless of class, together with ministers are slaves. High nobles sign their letters to their tsar “your slave Ivashka or Petrushka”, etc. If someone signed Ivan or Peter, he would lose his life. The Muscovites are convinced that their whole country, with all its wealth and all its people, is the private property of the tsar, and he has a divine right to do whatever he wants with the estates and people. Muscovites do not have simple moral principles. They don't want to learn from strangers, even though they behave their best. This nation, born and raised in slavery, is enraged when the king's despotism weakens a little. Muscovites are submissive only if they are restrained and under the yoke... The upper classes, although slaves themselves, treat the low classes as slaves. Having no simple culture, Muscovites consider deception to be the greatest wisdom. In lies, they know neither boundaries nor the slightest shame. Ordinary human virtues are so foreign, incomprehensible to Muscovites, that they consider meanness a high virtue... These people hate freedom, protest if it is imposed on them. If any tsar ruled like kings in Europe, that is, if he managed state affairs without interfering in the private and public life of his citizens, then the Muscovites would not listen to this and would certainly kill him... Moscow soldiers of their own free will, without orders, like to cruelly mock, torturing prisoners. In Muscovy, one can always and everywhere for little money find false witnesses who will swear on the cross and the Gospel in the church. Even the Turks do not have such vile lackey to the higher and such cruel mockery of the lower, defenseless.”

In the 11th and 13th centuries, the Ruses peacefully colonised the barbaric population of their northeast and brought civilization to the local people. From Rus, Rus-Ukrainian Christians went to those lands as missionaries and instilled in the people there a Slavic language, which is known now as Russian (it was originated from Old Bulgarian with the addition of Ukrainian grammar). Modern Russian language includes also words from the Tatar language, which was done by linguist Vladimir Dal' who collected their first dictionary in 1840. It is interesting to note that there was no word 'conscience' in the dictionary.

Since the invasion of the Tatar-Mongols in the 13th century, this land was already developing under the rules of new conquerors and the old habits of the Muscovites. In the 15th century the Muscovites defeated the Golden Horde of the Mongols and then ruled independently in their land.

In the end of 17th century, the Muscovites captured Rus-Ukraine. This led to a rise in Moscow's economy, culture, and public administration, as administrative positions were now dominated by Ukrainian people from developed territories with long traditions. In the future, all the development of Muscovy after the conquest of Rus-Ukraine was due to the direct exploitation of Rus-Ukrainians; in particular, this is described in a book: Ivan Ohienko, Ukrainian Culture (1918).

After 1991, the Muscovites were left alone. They lost their bearings – the guiding Communist Party was already absent, their own criminal clans were formed in the ruling elite, the people as a whole were left to fend for themselves. Their history, written 300-200 years ago, is completely false. There are no real heroes and moral values. There are no more Ukrainians with them who would guide them and keep them from moral decline. As ties with Ukraine were lost, the Muscovites began to rely on a fairy tale invented by their emperors in the 18th and 19th centuries, according to which they are a superior race on a global scale. As a result, in 30 years their society has come close to what Sigismund von Herberstein described in 1549. The country has no traditions that would stimulate its development. On this vast territory, a new generation of young people has already been born without motives for self-development, living without guidelines and under the influence of daily propaganda of hostility to the outside world.

Leading Muscovite writers and cultural figures of the 19th and 20th centuries noted that Muscovites themselves were extremely rude, deceitful, and prone to destruction.

Of course, in every nation there are at least a few per cent of intelligent people; but in the case of the Muscovites, the number of people with a destroyed mentality is too great. Indeed, in our days up to 80% of Muscovites support their war in Ukraine and more than 70% want to fight against the European Union. On Russian social networks, they call on their army to destroy everything in Ukraine and ruthlessly kill all Ukrainians.

Western countries made many serious mistakes during the collapse of the USSR. First of all they did not take into account the important role of Ukraine in the life of Muscovy and they did not pay the necessary attention to the development of Ukraine. Of course, Ukraine could not be deprived of nuclear weapons in 1994. That was a huge mistake of the Western world. It was necessary to act on the contrary – to consider Ukraine as a completely equal country with Muscovy and further invest heavily in its development and transformation into a fully democratic state. In turn, this would have a positive effect on the democratisation of Muscovy itself. The western countries had to strictly control the reforms in Ukraine in the sphere of state development and in no case should it be forced to reduce the Ukrainian army. But western officials (in particular from the USA) who came to Kyiv in 1990-1991 directly said that they were not interested in us, Ukrainians, and considered us as a black hole between the western world and Russia. Thus, Ukraine, as the cradle of world civilisation, was thrown into the backyard of global development.

Is it possible to change the situation and how to do it? The answer is quite obvious – Ukraine needs help in all its serious troubles in which it finds itself. After all, scientific research shows that everything is interconnected through Space that provides communication between us at the field level. Absolutely all events on our planet are interconnected. Ukraine is the holder of the roots of world civilization and therefore must be protected by all civilized countries. Methods of support can be completely different – both in the form of state aid and private initiatives. Democracy in Ukraine, as a basis for sustainable development, must be saved.

In order to stop Russia's attack on Ukraine, it is necessary to go beyond purely materialist views and adopt knowledge from the field structure of the world. Maps of Ukraine for 1919 show that the eastern border was significantly shifted to the east compared to today and the border completely covered all ethnic lands of Ukraine. In fact, the territory of Ukraine reached the Don River, behind which the so-called Russia (i.e., Muscovy) had already begun. The Don River used to be the border between Europe and Asia.

Map of Ukraine in 1919.

The communist Soviet government barbarically separated a large part of Ukrainians from Ukraine and assigned them to Muscovy, where Ukrainians were deprived of the opportunity to study in their native language and be called Ukrainians – all of them recorded as Russians (i.e., Muscovites). Also, the Russians for some reason shifted the geographical border between Europe and Asia to the Volga River. This border is not true. Eastern Slavs reached the Don River and onwards they, as Europeans, did not build their settlements because those lands already belonged to other non-European peoples.

Therefore, it is obvious that the Slavic lands inhabited by Slavs should be ceded to Ukraine. Muscovites, as the generalized name of all Finno-Ugric peoples, must go to their lands beyond the Don River, move away from the Black and Azov Seas, and return the Kuban to Ukraine. The eviction of a large number of Muscovites from these lands beyond the Don River is also quite acceptable.

The geographical border between Europe and Asia should run along the Don River. After all, it was the same in previous centuries and such boundary is the natural dividing line between European and Asian races.

It is also important that Russia begin to study its true history. After all, for 300 years they have been instilling to themselves and the world a fake that they come from Kyiv, from ancient Rus. That is why it is strange for them to look at Kyiv inhabited by some strangers, Ukrainians; according to their propaganda, this is their land, the land of the Russians! Instead of such a falsehood already introduced into academic rank, they must finally turn to their real history, to the nationalities of which the Russian Federation is composed: Merya, Mordva, Meshchera, Moksha, Erzya and so on, and also Tatars. There are about 160 non-Slavic nationalities in total in modern Russia and there is no Slavic 'Russian Federal Republic'!!

In the nearest future negotiations between Ukraine and its civilized allies with Russia, it is important to give all peoples the opportunity to express themselves about how they see their future, within what limits they see their borders. After all, many countries in the past have suffered from the aggressive actions of Russia. Therefore, different countries need to express their views on their historical borders. After that, an international congress is to take place, at which the borders on a large part of the planet adjacent to Muscovy must be finally determined. The result should be recorded in a general declaration, which should replace the outdated Helsinki Declaration on Security and Co-operation of 1975. It must be recalled that after the collapse of the inviolable USSR, many new countries were formed and their views on borders were not considered. Then all the countries that sign this declaration automatically become guarantors of peace in this environment. Any armed conflict between two or a group of signatory countries must be settled by all those countries which signed up to this Universal Declaration.

The countries that sign the Universal Declaration must change the aggressive misanthropic nature of Russia (i.e. Muscovy), whose society is still in a savage state millennia ago. Russia must be deprived of all offensive weapons, namely: nuclear weapons, long-range and medium-range missiles, tanks, chemical weapons, biological weapons. Countries that have signed the Universal Declaration must join in carrying out educational work among Muscovites and converting them to civilization (study of true history, elements of their cultures and languages, respect for man, etc.). If desired, Muscovy can be divided into several separate countries of course. It is possible that such an activity will take many years, maybe three generations or so. Such actions are absolutely necessary and cannot be postponed, because today's Muscovy community is extremely dangerous and can destroy the entire planet.

And finally, the Russians (that is, the Muscovites) must return to their country the real name – Muscovy.
